BLEEDING HEARTS.

Kate's Novel-A Romance in One

Act and Two Scenes. Two girls hurst late the library of E --- Seminary, and, linding it apparently ompty, the elder began: "I just hate her, so there! Spiteful old thlag! She's just jealous of us girls. Novel wanta us to have a bit of fua. Nevet had a benn la her life, I know, except old Dr. Slone, and he's deaf as a post, ias hurled three wives alrendy, and only wants her for a aurse and governess for his ten brats, half of 'em twins, I de believel She's too sharp for that, though. Catch her! Wants one of the Professors over nt the coflege; that's why she's so cross about our rianlag off with the juniors night before last fur a sleigh-ride. Think's she'll please President Foster, and all that. Never mind, Cad! Heather Will said he'd come over to-night, and when he pulls a string tied to a nall, that ticks on my when he puis a string tied to a nall that ticks on my whidow, I'll slip out and samggle him in under my water-proof. We'll fix a nice place in the closet to hide him if mey one comes, and wo'll just have the jolliest times! ile'll bring a can of oysters, and we'll cat 'om raw with pickles and crackers. You hide some pickles and crackers. You hide some salt and pepper in your apron pocket at supper; and we've a dipper, and a time enp, and a vasn that'll do for some dishes. So we'll laugh in our sleeves at the nld snap-stragon, and she cm't help herself—aow, Cad, don't cry. If there's anything I hale it's n ery-haby. Just as if girls at boarding-school findn't had just such times over and over again, and acqually lived through them before our day. For my part, I told Hack Tom if he sees up. ALBERT B. TAVEL through them before our day. For my part, I told Uacle Tom If he sent me back here I'd do just as I pleased, and they might send me heare in disgrace as often as the lit was on. I'm going the back here a good time. I've a postoillee to have a good time. I've a postollee uader n tlat stone in the corner of the grounds, and I get lots of letters from the boys up at the Commercial. Last Christmas, when you and the Old Cat were oil for the holidays, I played sick so as not to go to service. Then I rolled up soam blankets, dressed them ln my wrapper, laid them lu the bed, and paid Nora a dellar to pretend every and paid Nora a dellar to pretend every time any one asked for me that. I was asleep and must not be disturbed. Then I slipped out and went off with lirother Will to Excelsior after the gayest horse in a hit of cutter that fulrily flew. We went to the hotel, and asked all over flown for a unlister, just to make believe we had run away to he married. Why I should die in this poky old sem if Will didn't knew all the boys and holp me out." Thus the wild girl rattled on until her companion's oyes were fairon until her companion's oyes were fairly dried and laughing again. Hut the teacher, who sat in the enralaed recess of a deep window, an unwilling ilstener to this daring recital, grow and swipper s gradually more grave and serious, and when the bold, confident voice rang out with:

"Of course, she was never in love as you and Will are. What does she know about leve? Why Will would just die for you. He fairly, worships your very shoe-bottoms, and all that sert of thing. He would wither right away and go late a deeline if you refused to see him. It would kill him, I knew it would. He is so affectionate and so certified. But it would with the see him. ls so affectionate and so sensitivel ! lint she makes you think it's wicked to be in love, to love deeply and truly and to the hitter end. Hint I know better!"

As these words fell upon the listener's ear the hands passed up before the eyes. ear the mands passed up before the eyes, merely resting lightly at first upon the level brows, then gradually pressing mere and more closely upon the tight-shut lids, while one hy one the tears' 'stole down and fell upon the soft, gray inbrie of the teacher's dress. She thought of one teacher's dress. She thoughtof one she knew so long ago, of the love-story she had lived, and scarcely knew, until it had vanished in the morning of her life, and left her pale, forlern and lonely, a stranded wreck upon the shere of tum. It had indeed been a forry task to pick up the heaten remnants of what once had been a gallnut, craft and holst sail npon a henceforth trackless sea. To-day was an anniversary. She remem-bered and she kept it. Without it was day was an aniiversity. She remembered and she kept it. Without it was snewling wildly, and the hare bonglis of the trees chifed angrily against each other, sometimes rocking in the mad hinst until they tapped with fey fingers against line window-pines. She had ben chiding these two girls, and justly, for letting themselves ont of a wiadow with two sheets, and joining a pair of boys from a acighboring college in a midaight sleighride; said boys having borrowed Deacen Potter'a horses and sleigh, without permission—"Just to show the old fellow what we can do," and saucy Will Carney. But, although it was not mentioned, the lecture was less severe and the teacher'a opinion of the girls' escapade was very, very different indeed from the fact that the party bud, kept together and that two party had, kept tagether and that two of the quartet were brother and sister.
Indeed Kate Carney, the defiant school-girl had been sent home so often

Teracil loose to hotel life, I should feel personally responsible if harm came to her just new. Sharm warm-hearted, trustful and without a thought of cell. It might be much worse. Try her once more, and let me take all the care and responsibility. Tell her gunrd an this. I mny aot succeed; but, with your perluission, I will try.

So Kate had returned, and as a pun-Ishment for her transgressions her uncle Tem had kept her at the institutheir during the Christmas helidays.
Miss Chesterfield's vigilinace trad been so far rewarded. Only these two tlagrant breaches of discipline and occurred: Once during the Christman holidays, when Miss Chesterfield wan awny, and the other the moonlight sleighride, both the result of harmless high spirits. These had only comhigh spirits. These had only com-promised herself and her room-ante, whereas, during her lirst two years at the seminary she had not only been in constant trouble herself, but on each occusion managed to draw in with her from six to a dozen companions and us many collego lads.
As the teacher sat there is the window, the tenrs trickling through her tingers, she did not hear the door close after Careline as she tripped lightly out. She fergot that it was cold; forgot that it was wlater; forgot the necessity for present action, and seemed to be sitting for that last time on the doorsitting for that last time on the doorsteps at home la his favorite rose-tinted dress, with the soft, white cashmere wrap lving across her shoulders, her golden hair pressed sucothly down upon her cheek and gathered up in shinlag braids behind, after the fashlon of the day, a fashlon that her dear, dead mother's hand knew so well how to adjust. Another sat bes'de her, and into his dark eyes she dared not look. They had been very silent. And then he ra'sed with teader touch the sprny of "bleeding hearts" she had fastened at raised with tender touch the sprny of "bleeding hearts" she had fastened at her thront, and said: "The ladians wear the scalps of their victims fastened to their belts; you carry the hearts of yours slung at your hreast-pin." Next he rose, laid a reverent hand upon her shining head (it did shine then) and said: "Farewell!" adding, "Ruth, you have never kissed me. Will you kiss me now just one good-by?" She had kissed him and watched him down the nath in the noff May mogalight, a little path in the acft May moonlight, a little silveriag sigh of the breezes running through the tops of the evergreens. Then she ran up-stairs, and cried, and rocked herself to and fro, and she had prayed to see her way more clearly—had agenized in prayer—had risen and stumbled hlindly ou just the same as if she had aever prayed at all. And they had never met again, and never would. And all the sweet old songs he loved were out of fashion long ago—dear "Bonnie Dooa" and beautiful "Lorena." She felt just now us if her honrt must break, and one quick sob scaped her hefore she quite remean-bered where she was. Dropping her hands, she leoked up to find kate Car-acy's astonished eyes regarding her in blank d'smay.

"Miss Chesterfield, what is It? Are you cry ag for what I said? O. Miss Chesterfield, fargive mel I didn't know; I was so angry! Don't cry, Miss Chosterlield, and I won't let Will come in toterilohi, and I won't let Will come in tonight, nor ever. I'll be good as long as I pass bly can, if you only, won't ery."

For that teacher's hands agala covered her face, and her frame quivered with the overflow of emotion. Making as effort, Miss Chesterfield soon raised her head, and, taking Kate's hand between both her own, she said, with a faint surle, "I can not talk to you to day. I will some time, and soon. No, don't let Will in to-night. But you nad Car oline and Funny come to my room, and we'll persuade Mrs. Dolittle to let us pull some candy in the kitchen. It is just the weather for a caudy-pull." K ssing Kate's glowing cheek, she jussed out had to her own room, where to welcome her as lyer-throated canary trifled ont. "Tell it-tell lt-tell it-why-y-y-y don't you tell it—tell it—why-y-y-y don't you tell it!"

And she did tell it.
For several days Miss Chesterfield was confined to her room, 'She had taken cold sitting in the window, and thad mover affected her so strangely before. When perfectly still she was confortable, but when shoraised her hend, nuck sharp pains durted about her brows and eyes, and the well-known room soun shari pains direct about her brows and eyes, and the well-known room spun vaguely out inlo space. As she had always declared, Kute Carney had a tender, affectionale heart, and, feeling herself partially responsible for the teacher's indisposition, she was indefatigable In her attentions, sludying at the bed-side, and attending to her slightest wishes very gently and quietly. Now, Dr. Parker had allowed her to sit up a Dr. Parker had allowed her to sit up a 1ttle while yesterday, to be dressed loday, and next she might, he promised, henr some of her classes in her room. Kate Carney had come up from her last recitation, and Miss Chestorfield had urged her to take exercise in the hright, clear Jamiary air; but Kate begged so piteously to remain that, the teacher radictionally consented.

luctuativ consented. "Now, Miss Chesterfield," began Kate, with a little half air of defiance, "you said ou that Suturday that you would talk to me some other time about the dreadful things I said to Caroline the dreadful things I said to Caroline and which you happened to hear. If you are strong onough I wish you'd do it to-day. I don't want to have it hanging over my 'hend like somebody'a aword Uncle Tom talka about."

The little hird perked its head on one side and twittered at Miss Chesterfield: "Tell it—tell it—tell it—why-y-y-y don't you tell it!"

you tell iti"

'Yes, I will," she answered to both, hidding Kate draw her chair closer, and, calling her attention to a very and, caining her attention to a very quaint picture of an old-fashiened girl in an ambretype ease on the book-shelf, she coutlnued: "Kate, you and I are friends, I know, and you must not any loager think that I eried that day because you called me a few foolish names. One who has taught fifteen or twenty years does not expect to please every-body. Certain restraints we must place about onr pupils for their own good and the mutual heacit of their assoand the mutual henefit of their associates. But I must not tire myself by philosophizing to hegin with. I am going to tell you a love-story."

"A feve-story!" O, Miss Chesterfield! Is it real? Did you know it?"

"Yes, I knew it, for I was in it. After I have told you, you must not speak of it again. It is just yours and mine to know. I don't know why I tell you. Partly because you aaw me so undigai-Partly because you as we as undigatified as to cry that day, and you know (smiling) you 'hate a cry-bahyl' But I can not tell you all the 'becauses,' for I do not know them myself. Kate, I do not know them myself. Kate, I want you to bolieve in me, to bolieve me human like yourself; to know that I sympathize with you in your joya and sorrowa, and would not deny you any pleasure it were good for you to have. When I looked like that picture I met my hero., As I remember him he was tall and slight, with large, dark eyes, black, waving halr, and very pale. He was then a atudent, and an industrious one. He was my hrother's friand, and that the friently had seriously dehated the necessity of refusing her readmission in November atter her suspension in October, hut Miss Chesterfield had stoutly plended for her. Shu had around thus: "The girl has so mether, but has a mether, that we never thought of love. Books and study we mutually udored, and toth of us graduated twice with all the joy of conquered studies and friendly interest lu enchother. And, dear child. interest in enchother. And, dear child, for three years (the brightest I have ever known) we were duily together and engaged more or less in the sume pursurs. What could be expected? We were happiest when together, and that was all we ever acknowledged; even to curselves."

Then the tencher lold her story. There came, first, the separation of distance; next, misuaderstanding and aliention; the lenging of each for reconcil ation; the pride that rebelled against advances, followed by her ongagement to mother. Then, by accident, the removal of the barriers that estranged them, and, aciden, had been to blace. thou, and aeither had been to blauc. How he catrented her to be true to him! Then came the deciding voice-her mother's! For some reason the change had gratilied her; and now the prospect of a return to the first love pained her inexpressibly. Distressed and bewil-dered, but obedient and dutiful, after ong deliberation, she refused and gave to hope and love an eternal farewell. But that had not been all. He had

"And left you? How mean! how shameful! After all—"

"No. ao! Kato, he was right. Our marringo would have been a bitter, hellow means." marringo would have been a bitter, hol-low mockery. I am happier as, It is, and I believe that Charles Chapin is true to me to-day somewhere, If he yet lives. Listen, Kntel After all these years (and it was long ago) I cried that day over all this, and not at anything you said. I am tired new. If you'll draw the hliad to shade my eyes, you may take down that book of poems and look at the scanty relies of my past. I have nothing else left of my story—only the sword of Damooles has fallen, and I have said It all."

Kata did as requested. The book was have said it all."

Kate did as requested. The book was a volume of Jean Ingelow's, and between the lenves that held the lines of that matchless poem, "Divided," were pressed a love-letter yellow with age. a leaf from a lemon-tree, a spray of "bleeding hearts," and a fragment of an envelope on which was written in a manly hand, "Amo: in hec spes m.a." also, tinely-written in Miss Chestorfield's most careful penmnnship, these stanzas

Kate Carney hummed a little lovesong softly to hersolf—sad it was a happy little one—as she lit the night-happy fittle one—as she lit the nighthappy little one—as she lit the night-lamp and arranged the table at the tencher's bedside that night. Then she stood a moment twisting a hit of fringe in her nervous lingers before she leaned down, half shy, half ashamed, and klssed Miss Chesterfield's thin and faded cheek.

If she wrote to Uncle Tom more frequently than usual the uext few mentlis, and if she took unusual interest in his hachelor chums—especially one silent specimen who before now had always bored her—"he seemed so superior to smiles"—If she did all this, with malice miles"—If she did all this, with mulice prepense, she deliherately plotted her, nischlef that very night. Uncle Tom didn't show me his letters; but when the holidays approached, the summer vacation. I happen to know that this little missive was flung triumphantly into the E——letter-box by the careless little hand that in an agony of impatience neglected to date it or to add that usual an about to a feminion letter, the next cap sheaf to a feminine letter-the post-

It was the evening before graduation. The benutiful grove around the E—Sambary was all a-flutter with the Seminary was all a-llutter with the light draperies of the girls whose exam nations were over, and who awaited the nations were over, and who awaited the closing oxereless before returning lot their distant homes. Many guests were there besides, and the hright clear northera skies looked down with propitions smiles upon the little city. As aliss Chesterfield, for the last time that sumaier, gave a well-thumbed copy of Virgil a little shove late its place on the book-shelf she saw, without interest, two strangers, tall and military, pace up the building, ring, and pass leisurely

Captain Carney was perfectly nonchacaptain Carney was perfectly noncina-lant under the artillery of the bright ayes that regarded them. But Mr. Chapin, looking alightly annoyed, turned neither to the right nor to the left, and, as they ontered the parlors after sending up their carda, twisting his lron-gray mustache iu an absent way, he remarked:

'Captain, there is something pa'n-and each broken heart had flung a llower on the coffins.'

"Quite poetical, slmost tragie--" began Captain Caraey, but Kete sprang

Mr. Chapin, If she is an old mnid." And she harried them oil into a quiet, obseure little wook in one corner of the building.

Mlss Chesterfield stood at the book shelf, her hand resting on the Virgil, and her face turned dreamily toward the window, when Kate rushed in nad surprised her with a shower of earesses. mingled with frantic declarations of "Uncle Tem's here! Come, come! Down "Uncle Tom's here! Come, come! Down in No. 7!" and carried her off by force of arms, pansing long enough in the hall to catch up from a table a spray of "hleeting hemts" and fasten in Miss Chesterfield's breast-pin, in spite of that lady's faint protest.

"Tell it, tell it—tell it, why-y-y-y net tell it," chirped the canary at the window. The door of No. 7 was flung grandly open. Miss Chesterlich!'s name was announced to Mr. Chapin. Kate sprang to her uncle's side. The two freed each eather, stunned, heavildered. faced each other, stunned, bewildered. He stood for an Instant painfully creet and motionless. CARD SHARPERS IN PARIS.

Fundament the Parishme for Gambilog-If we may judge by the pages, of M. des Perrieres the Parisians are restless and hardened gamblers nad ready to play anything anywhere with anybody. There are three places where they mny play chiefly-In the real clubs, in the clubs which are open to almost may one and which, in fact, exist only that gnmbling may be carried on, and in the illegal gaming houses. Of real clubs there are not many in Paris and access there are not many in Paris and access is not easy; but there is accend of gumbling clabs dignified by some glittering and lond-sounding title. Strangely energh there is a greater danger of being cheated in the former than in the latter, for, in the gambling clubs there is not always a let of cheats watching each other and well writher the proprieter. by the proprietor, who is up to nll clubs, although it would be difficult for an adventurer to gain admittance, there is no sasplelon, and once la, a rascal might cheat with impunity if he were cautious and not ever-grasping. At equite or piquet, where he has but one opponent to decelve, the Greek eight to be able to win what he likes; but at haecarat, where he plays against the whole table, the simple devices of tote a-tete deceit must be abandoned. M des Perrieres reveals the secrets of the players who ehoat the dealor and of the dealer who cheats the players. By collusion with a card-room attendant, that dealer may distribute eards enrofully arranged in what the conjurer would call a chaplet. With a chaplet the dealer reduces the chances against him to those expressed in the old fermula, "Heads I win, inlls you lose." A thorough shuftle is a sure cure for the chaplet; and of course cutting has no effect. There are various chaplets known to the initiated. M. des Perrieres tells us of a player who was losing stondily to the denier and who suddenly recognized the se-quence of the cards as they fell on the table. "Why, that is the Marseilles chaplet," he erled; "the next card will be the king of hearts." And the dealer turned it up and it was the king of licerts, and then the player proceeded to declare every card before it was turned, to the grent amusement of the players, who ceased betting at onen. The feelings of the dealer are not described weekly leaguage could not scribed; probably lnaguage could not do them jaxtice. Another device which an unserupufrom the last century; at least it is closely akin to a trick of that time, in which a anuff-box took the place of s which a anuli-box took the place of s clgarette case. It is of a great simpllo ity. The dealer provides himself beforehand—to use the pleasant phrase-ology of the old-fishiened handbooks of conjuring—with a highly pollahed silver eigarette case. This he places on the table before him and immediate, where the places of the conjuring with a distributed silver of the conjuring the ly nader his left hand as he distributes the eards. If he has some slight man-ual dexterity, a quick eye and unfailing self-possession, the reflecting surface of the silver will keep him fully laformed as to the value of every card before it leaves his hands, and he may act accordingly. Self-possession, and indeed self-confidence, are necessary requisites of a successful gambler, even when he is not given to alding chance. Fortune (avors the brave, and gambling is like swimming in that the first touch of fear la fatal. Especially must the dealer at bacearnt abound in courage; let him but begin to show the white feather and his banking funds will speedily take wings and ily away to feather the nest of some player of more stomach.— London Salurday Review.

One of the usea that is being made of the special delivery stamps in some cities is calculated to arouse the Indignation of the card-carriers. The young men write cards to their girls to make engagements and send them through the malls instead of by bootblacks and errand-boys. It is considered more stylish and is not so expensive.

The South Kentuckian has no disposition to deny to the Loulsville Commercial its "freedom of a citizen" in telling the Democrats how to run the next Legislature. It is not likely, however, that the views of a paper which, professing to be independent, has always been hostlle to the Democratle party will have much weight with the Democratic members of the Legislature.

Efforts are being made to induce Judge Rodes, the defeated contestant of Hon. W. L. Reeves for the Democratic nomination in the 5th Juduelal district, to make the race as an independent. The Rodea Democrats in Butler county propose to hold a prlmary election to prove that Rodes was the choice of that county, which was counted for Reevea.

A BLCODY MURDER

A cottage for rent, apply to Juo. Pleas Pendergrass Killed Near the Caldwell County Line, by Walter Greer and Alex Inglice.

Correspondence of the South Kentickland

MACEHONIA, Nov. 2, 1885. Agulu I am called upon to report one of the many brutal murders that the Cumberland Presbyterlan church mark the history of our country. On last Thursday evening the news spread like wildfire that Walter had shot and killed Pleas Pendergrass,near that town. It was that annonneed that Greer had shot Penderof an altereation between the murdered boy and a boy by the name of Inglice, began to dovelop and the pubhe began to think and speak of the matter as a premeditated and well planned assassluation upon the part church last Sunday. There were interviewed, whereupon Greer confessed that he shot Pendergrass behe fired Inglice also fired a pistol, and were bought from the npon examining the corpse it was found that two loads had taken of the Bankrupt Sale.
